Summary

My name is Brandon Dorn, and I'm a user experience designer. I solve business problems with my mind and my heart, which is to say that I believe the success of any product is determined by how well it fits and serves the people who use it.

I got my start as a brand strategist at Leo Burnett in Chicago, where I learned that behind every business problem is a fundamental human problem that can only be uncovered through diligent, inventive research. Before that, I studied English Literature and Economics, which taught me how to understand the complexity of micro personal relationships and macro market systems.

I currently work as a UX designer in State Farm's Systems Department, one of the largest of its kind. Teams across the enterprise invite me to help create applications that enable efficient interaction with and understanding of complex data. I lead the user research and visual design of these applications, and collaborate with development teams to make them a reality.

My work as a designer is marked by the pursuit of interfaces that gracefully present nuanced information. Although I regularly work on final UI designs, I feel my strengths lie in conducting research, designing information, and prototyping.
